

america

Something Cool: A 'Hopscotch Crosswalk' In Baltimore

DECEMBER 03, 2013 1:50 PM ET

EYDER PERALTA

The most famous crosswalk in the world has to be Abbey Road. But, today, the city of Baltimore unveiled what could be the most entertaining of crosswalks.

The street crossings adjacent to the Bromo Seltzer Arts Tower in downtown are now equipped with four different games of hopscotch. Take a look:

One section of the hopscotch crosswalk being installed.

Graham Coreil-Allen /via Flickr

The crosswalk hopscotch as seen from above.

Graham Coreil-Allen/via Flickr

As The Baltimore Sun explains, this is all part of the Baltimore Office of Promotion and the Arts' effort to put art in public spaces. In another part of town, for example, another artist designed a crosswalk that "looks like a giant zipper opening."

Naturally, this made us curious about other inventive crosswalks across the country. Turns out there are many that are just as cool: Back in June, Milwaukee transformed one of its crosswalks into piano keys, and in Miami during the world-class Art Basel art fair, one crosswalk was transformed into a piece called "Crosswalks of Additive Color."

Of course in Baltimore, there will undoubtedly be those who ask if a hopscotch crosswalk is safe. We've posed that question to the BOP and we'll update this post with their response.

Update at 5:05 p.m. ET. On Safety:

Tracy Baskerville, a spokeswoman for BOP, tells us this about any safety concerns:

"We did work with a review panel including a representative from the Department of Transportation to approve the designs for the Crosswalk Project. We think it is always nice for residents to engage public art; however all pedestrians need to be mindful of the traffic, crosswalk signals and traffic lights."

crosswalks baltimore

OLDER

Dead Mice Update: Tiny Assassins Dropped On Guam Again

NEWER

Man Killed In Shark Attack Off Maui

About

Subscribe

NPR News Twitter

Support comes from:

© 20152015 npr

SHARE

